

Mimi Kiser DMin, MPH, RN
Senior Program Director, Interfaith Health Program
Assistant Professor, Department of Global Health
Rollins School of Public Health
Emory University

Ms. Kiser joined the Interfaith Health Program in 1993 during its first seven years at The Carter Center. Ms. Kiser has a background in community health nursing and health education. She teaches interdisciplinary courses at Emory in faith and health, religion and development, and social justice. Ms. Kiser has focused on building the capacity of health groups to form collaborative relationships with the faith community, specifically through networks such as the American Public Health Association's Caucus on Public Health and the Faith Community, the Coalition for Healthier Cities and Communities' Faith Action Team, and the Public Health Leadership Society.

For six years she directed IHP's "Institute for Public Health and Faith Collaborations," funded by the CDC to provide multi-sector leadership development for the elimination of health disparities. Currently Ms. Kiser is leading the Academic Programs Working Group for Emory's Religion and Public Health Collaborative and working with IHP colleagues in teaching and community mobilization activities supported by the CDC and HHS throughout the US and in Kenya. In 2011 Mimi completed her doctorate in ministry at Wesley Theological Seminary focusing on "boundary leadership" within the track Faith and the Health of Communities.
