

Madisen Stearns*Master of Public Health student*Columbia University Mailman School of Public Health

Madisen Stearns is a Master of Public Health student at Columbia University Mailman School of Public Health, specializing in Population and Family Health with a focus on infectious disease epidemiology. She earned her bachelor's degree in Public Health from The College of New Jersey and has experience in research, community health assessment, and health education. Madisen currently serves as an Outreach and Development Intern at Unity Consortium, where she supports grant development, content creation, and national immunization initiatives. She is passionate about improving health equity and has presented her work on community health and vulnerable populations at national public health conferences.