

Daisy Winner

Program Manager, Information Futures Lab and Dean's Special Projects
Brown University School of Public Health

Daisy Winner is a Program Manager at the Information Futures Lab within the Brown University School of Public Health, where she leads initiatives focused on vaccine equity, health misinformation, and health disparities. With over a decade of experience in academic and nonprofit global and public health organizations, her work spans strategic communications, research coordination, and program development. Daisy's current work explores the barriers communities face in accessing reliable health information and how these barriers affect health outcomes and exacerbate disparities. Her expertise in knowledge translation, multidisciplinary research, and community engagement supports collaborations across sectors to inform public policy and intervention strategies. Prior to her role at Brown, Daisy worked at the Harvard Global Health Institute on projects related to health misinformation, pandemics, and racial health disparities, and at Seed Global Health, where she managed programs focused on strengthening medical and nursing education in sub-Saharan Africa. She holds a BA in Psychology and Global Health from Lesley University and has co-authored multiple publications on vaccine demand, misinformation interventions, and health equity.

Contact:

daisy_winner@brown.edu

<https://www.linkedin.com/in/daisy-winner/>